Q: Is there a way to use inbuilt synchronization on a list? I'm currently working on a multi-threading chat application, where one thread sets the messages on a list, and the other thread prints them to the console. However, when one thread is accessing the list, and the other thread is printing the list, the thread accessing the list runs faster than the thread printing the list. So, the main thread will output the messages with gaps, and the other thread might not be able to add any messages to the list (since the list might already be accessed) Is there a way to ensure that the list is synchronized so that when one thread accesses it, the other thread can safely print out the messages? I think the way I'm currently doing it is wrong. The way I'm doing it, thread 1 can set and access the list and the 2nd thread should take messages from the list and print them. However, it is not happening that way. A: You need an appropriate Synchronized List if you want that property. There's also a thread safe LinkedList if you need it for your specific application. I think there's even something called a lock free List if you don't care about performance or robustness. I've had my GB Dry for 5-6 months and although I have succeeded in "cleaning" the denture permanently it has led me to
